

April 17

I did not write this, but I'm in total agreement with
it. you people have no
respect for human life.
you have no conscience plus I doubt if any of you have any common sense.
I've you'd all have a
mind full of knowledge
but that's where it ends.
But maybe I'm wrong. Let's put the steam on fire.
after all Big Business
dominates.

NRC is to blame

Those who continue to champion the cause of nuclear power, that is, the stockholders and any others with a financial interest, are either fools (which they are not) or they think the majority of the public are (which they are not). Why? Because there never was anything constructed of man-made materials and whose operation depended on the infallibility of man, that was not subject to some kind of malfunction and failure—which in this case could be with dire consequences. At Three Mile Island we saw both happen, with the added serious fact that the company lied about it and tried to cover it up.

When the sirens go off, where do we run to? Have you ever tried to get through Gilbertsville on a Friday or Saturday night when the sale was on? Multiply this condition many times and with the added element of terror—the whole scene being played throughout the area. Many people would not even be able to get out of their driveways. Then how far do we have to run to be in the clear? They can't tell you because the company doesn't believe there is any real danger! This happened at Three Mile Island several times and at numerous other plants in the country.

Our nuclear scientists tell us that any amount of radiation is too much.

With the start up day coming ever closer, and still no plan of evacuation made to the public, it would seem that the sirens are just window dressing, with no other purpose than to tell you that there is a real crisis, and there is nothing you can do about it.

PE is to blame for wanting to construct the plant in so densely populated an area, but the real irresponsible people are those of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission who granted approval for the project.
